briefing

Minorities, indigenous peoples and the post-2015 framework

Key findings

- Minorities and indigenous peoples have continued to experience discrimination and inequalities throughout the Millennium Development period. There must therefore be greater attention to the specific needs of these groups in the post-2015 framework, with a stronger focus on rights rather than targets, directed investment and fully disaggregated data, if these gaps are to be narrowed in the next 15 years.
- Without a clear focus on discrimination, it is unlikely that the situation of many minority and indigenous communities will improve in future. This is because the barriers to participation and service access often extend beyond resource limitations or weak governance. In this context, it is possible for countries to achieve rapid progress at a national level without any positive change for its most marginalized populations.
- Though the draft SDGs contain limited references to indigenous peoples, these do not go far enough in recognizing the deep-seated marginalization that they and religious, ethnic and linguistic minorities experience. As inequalities in health, education, livelihoods and other areas are interconnected, there needs to be a systematic focus on minority and indigenous inequality across all sectors of development.
- There is now growing awareness of the contribution that minority and indigenous knowledge can play in environmental conservation, local economies and other priority areas of the SDGs. Ensuring greater equality for minorities and indigenous peoples will therefore not only benefit these communities, but also further the general progress of countries in their realization of more sustainable development outcomes.
